The Archery and Crossbow guilds of Late Medieval Bruges

Archery and Crossbow guilds appeared across Northern Europe in the early fourteenth century, they were soldiers, they were social groups, even networks, and they organised some of the greatest spectacles of the later Middle Ages, yet they have not received the analysis they deserve. Excellent local histories have been undertaken, charting the rights, properties and services of particular guilds;¹ studies have been made of some of the more famous competitions,² and even the interactions between the guilds and the dukes of Burgundy,³ but for the guild-brothers themselves, and their part in the urban world, unproven assumptions are common. The present study, part of a larger project,⁴ will focus on the Bruges guilds; after briefly examining the guilds' origins, their social and devotional activities, and their spectacular competitions, guild-brothers themselves will be examined.

ORIGINS OF SHOOTING GUILDS

Archers and crossbowmen appear in numerous descriptions of medieval armies, in Flanders crossbowmen were among the victorious host at Kortrijk in 1302.⁵ The earliest town accounts of Bruges, Ghent and Lille refer to zelscutters or les arbaletriers watching the walls even earlier;⁶ yet it is not clear that these shooters were guilds. The archers and crossbowmen who guarded the towns and who served in wars may have been the fathers, even grandfathers, of the men who formed the first shooting guilds, and certainly the martial significance of shooters and the violence of the early fourteenth century is part of the reason for shooting guilds' first appearance, but the guilds were never simply militias, their origins cannot be explained simply by military needs.

No surviving Flemish or French source makes a direct link between war and the development of shooting guilds, though a nineteenth-century historian of Ypres referred to 'contemporary sources' that showed their archery guild was founded by men returning from Kortrijk.⁷ As all town archives were lost in the First World War, such claims cannot be proven or disproven, inventories written in the 1850s and 60s do not mention the guilds until they received a charter from Philip the Good.⁸ Guilds were more than soldiers; they were unified societies with festive and devotional bonds, and the first references to the guilds as such appear earlier in Flanders than elsewhere.⁹ The Ghent guilds are perhaps the oldest; their crossbow guild of Saint George began receiving annual support in 1315.¹⁰ The Oudenaarde crossbowmen were in existence by 1322, the date of their earliest membership lists, and the Lille guilds began to receive civic funding in 1323.¹¹ In Bruges, the crossbowmen first received civic support for their annual shooting competition, the papegay, in 1336.¹² As well as the archers and crossbowmen, Bruges contained a third guild, the lesser crossbowmen, called the Jongehof; they have left fewer sources, and were probably founded in mid fifteenth century.¹³ The Bruges crossbowmen may be even older; a fifteenth-century guild book contains a copy of a 1321 charter in which Mary, Lady of Eyn and of Bremen, gave the ‘guild of the crossbowmen in Bruges’ permission to use her chapel of Saint Peter’s for their masses, and install their own chaplain.¹⁴ Across Flanders, archery and crossbow guilds began to receive support for their activities between 1315 and 1325. It is possible, even likely, such groups had shot and drunk together for several years before this date as informal unsupported groups, but such groups should not be considered as formal guilds.

War is not the only explanation for the development of the guilds, yet the Bruges guild-brothers were soldiers, and served in civic and princely armies across the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. In 1340 the Bruges guilds may have been among the crossbowmen at the battle of Sluis and siege of Tournai,¹⁵ the Saint George guild were part of the Flemish naval force that blockaded Antwerp for Louis of Males in 1356.¹⁶ Guilds also defended not just their own towns but Flanders as a whole. In 1405 with a growing threat of English attack, the guilds of Douai came to Bruges to help in its defence,¹⁷ and a few months later Bruges and Lille sent their guilds to strengthen the defences of Gravelines.¹⁸ The military service of the guilds did not vanish over the fifteenth century; the guilds of Douai and Bruges were with Charles the Bold at Montlhéry, and among his host at the siege of Neuse.¹⁹ After Charles's death in 1477, guilds served his son-in-law Maximilian at the battle of Guinegate in 1479.²⁰ The guilds were militarily important for the counts of Flanders and dukes of Burgundy, yet for the Flemish towns, yet they became far more than militias.

GUILDS AS SOCIETIES.

The guilds could be called confraternities, indeed French documents usually called them confréries. In Bruges, as in most Flemish towns, the crossbowmen were dedicated to Saint George, and the archers to Saint Sebastian. The archers of Saint Sebastian had a chapel in the impressive Franciscan monastery, which also housed the altars of some of Bruges' richest religious confraternities.²¹ Such a location would have given the archers great prestige, and may also have helped them avoid being associated with a particular parish church or particular area of influence. The guild took a genuine interest in devotion within their chapel and for remembrance of guild-brothers; a daily mass was to be performed, and a more elaborate mass sung on twelve saints' days. Fines were set out should the Franciscans fail to follow any of these provisions, and the archers did complain when Franciscans did not perform their services.²² The chapel was enhanced in 1428 when through the mediation of one guild-brother, Jacob vander Buerse, a member of the famous hostellers' family, the chapel received a fragment of the skull of Saint Sebastian from Pope Martin V. The guild also received papal indulgences for all who visited the chapel on Saint Sebastian's day, which they paid criers to announce annually.²³ The guild-brothers, like almost all late medieval confraternities,²⁴ were deeply concerned with remembrance. From 1425, when an archer died he was expected to leave the guilds his best bow and a further 2 shillings for the sounding of the bells, and a mass to celebrate his memory.

The crossbowmen of Saint George may have required masses to be said in their chapel since 1321. Their accounts begin in 1455, and demonstrate that masses were held on Saint George's day, the day of Our Lady and '12 other Sundays'.²⁵ Like the archers, the crossbowmen took care of deceased members, paying for, and being required to attend, remembrance masses each year in return for a death-fee of 5 shillings.²⁶ The guild also kept their chapel well supplied with wax and tallow for candles, and with bread and wine.²⁷ The chapel of Saint George was also luxuriously decorated, as shown by an inventory from 1438, the guild stored prizes they had won in shooting competitions in their chapel.²⁸ The chapel was further seen as a safe-house for guild's prizes, these included 'one jug weighing 3 marks, and this was won in Ypres by Jan Minne', 'one dragon weighing seven ounces and this was won at Sluis and was won by five shooters' and 'one unicorn weighing one mark 7 ounces three weights and this was won in Oudenaarde by the shooters in common'.

Expensive silver prizes would have brought prestige to the chapel, but other objects in the guild inventory are more personal, showing a greater devotion, in particular cloth from of altar cloths, curtains and some cushions. Some of the more luxurious cloth is noted as being a bequest, such as 'a fine red cloth' from my lord Jan Bortoen. Wills from Ghent show that many guild members, often women, left cloth to the guild chapel on their death,²⁹ it is likely that much of the cloth recorded in Bruges is similarly the result of bequests, but only items given by prestigious donors are recorded as such. The chapel also contained books and a large number of candles and candelabras, several crosses and a statute intriguingly described as 'Saint George weighing 6 marks three ounces, engraved with the words of Saint Georges in his hand'.³⁰ Both Bruges guilds took care of their chapels, investing in them not just to show status, to show the public face of their guilds, but to provide devotional outlets for their members.

The guilds took part in more public demonstrations to show their piety too, playing leading roles in the annual Holy Blood procession.³¹ With the public demonstration of unity and strength came private acts to build bonds and strengthen the network within guilds. On entering the guild, a new member had to pay an entrance fee, had to be skilled and had to be equipped, the crossbowmen also had to buy a kanne of wine for his new guild-brothers.³²

Once in the guild, the brothers were expected to support each other and behave fraternally to other guild-brothers. Rules from the crossbowmen expressly forbade any ‘dissent’ within the guild, on pain of a 20 shilling fine, and any who disobeyed a guild official risked being expelled from the guild.³³ The bonds within the guild should have been strengthened through annual feasts, which all brothers were required to attend, but as has been shown elsewhere, not all guild-brothers attended the annual meals, though most attended at least one feast during their time as guild-brothers.³⁴

COMPETITIONS

Within Bruges, guilds were defenders and were prestigious socio-devotional. When they left the town, to attend competitions, they played equally important roles, in their shooting skill, and in their displays and even drama they could represent or even augment civic honour. Archery and crossbow competitions appear not long after the guilds themselves; the first competition for which archival evidence could be found was held in Oudenaarde in 1329.³⁵ Competitions were never just about shooting skills; entrances and display were integral to the events as early as 1331 and by the fifteenth century prizes were awarded for best entrance, best costumes and for greatest distance travelled as well as many prizes for the best individual shot, the best four shots, the best team and for hitting the centre of the target.

Both the archers and crossbowmen of Bruges attended numerous competitions across and beyond Flanders in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. In a crossbow competition in Tournai in 1350 the Bruges guilds were described as ‘luxurious’ winning a prize for best entrance.³⁶ In 1408 in another competition in Oudenaarde the guild won another prize, the unicorn referred to above, for their fine entrance.³⁷ In 1427, again in Oudenaarde, both the lesser and greater crossbowmen of Bruges won wine for their shooting skill.³⁸ Their skills continued to be rewarded, and in 1498 in one of the last great shooting competitions in Ghent, the Bruges guild entered with 200 horsemen, numerous wagons representing great lords, at least one chamber of rhetoric, and won prizes for their entrance and their shooting skills.³⁹

In competitions guild networks could be formed that extended beyond those within Bruges, these could reach across Flanders and between the towns and the nobility. The networks developing within shooting competitions enhanced the various social and commercial networks that Stein has shown to be an integral part of the development of the Low Countries.⁴⁰ Philip the Fair entered Ghent in 1498 with the Bruges crossbowmen,⁴¹ in 1452 Lodewijk van Gruuthuse led the crossbowmen to a competition in Sluis and in 1447 Adolf of Cleves was with the guild at an event in Damme.⁴²

The Bruges guilds hosted smaller competitions, not as large as those in Ghent, Oudenaarde or Tournai, which strengthened localised links. An event of 1470 was attended only by the guild of Damme and Dudzele, guilds that were regularly invited to the archer's annual feast.⁴³ The bonds and networks evident within shooting competitions could also help to rebuild regional networks after wars and rebellions, as shown by small events held after the end of the 'Ghent War' in 1453.⁴⁴ In early 1455 the Bruges crossbowmen attended a 'thoorlement' in Ghent,⁴⁵ before guilds from both towns, and from 43 other towns, attended a great shooting competition in Tournai.⁴⁶ Shooting competitions were spectacular, taking over towns and market places for weeks, even months, at a time, filling city streets with hundreds of armed men and thousands of retainers, but they were not simply about display and spectacle, they brought honour and they strengthened regional networks.

THE GUILD-BROTHERS OF BRUGES

Examining the political, economic and social status of guild-brothers reveals far more about the guilds and their members than generalisations based on charters or some of the more prestigious and famous members. Yet such generalisations of elite or bourgeois status for guild-brothers are common, Arnade is typical in describing the guilds as 'staffed by townsmen of means but patronised selectively by noblemen and Burgundian sovereigns',⁴⁷ while Gunn, Grummit and Cools describe the guilds as 'manned by master-craftsmen and officered by the town elite', but neither can prove their assumptions.⁴⁸ Three small studies have analysed a particular guild, the archers of Saint-Winoksbergen, the crossbowmen of Ghent and the crossbowmen of Bruges.⁴⁹ In Bruges, both the archers and the crossbowmen have left a wealth of archival material, and these can be compared to other rich archives,⁵⁰ allowing for a detailed prosopographical study of both guilds in the fifteenth century. Prosopography, by studying a large number of individuals and asking set questions, can overcome issues of representativeness of source material; it can be defined as ‘an attempt to bring together all relevant biographical data of groups of persons in a systematic and stereotypical way’.⁵¹

The crossbowmen’s sources are in two parts, and have been studied before.⁵² Firstly a ‘guild-book’ with membership list, from 1437, and secondly account books, begun in 1445 with a gap between 1465 and 1470, and becoming fragmentary in 1481.⁵³ The list is a carefully thought out and planned project, the members are organised alphabetically by first name; many pages are still blank, as space was left for future members. In dating the membership list, based on palaeography and known dates of entrance, 902 crossbowmen, as shown in table 3, can be identified as guild-brothers between 1437 and 1481.

The records of the archers of Saint Sebastian are both more detailed and are more problematic. Excellent surveys of the guild have been produced by guild-members Henri Godar and Marc Lemahieu, but neither analyses the status of the guild-bothers.⁵⁴ No fifteenth-century membership list survives for the archers, so all names and all details come from the extremely detailed guild accounts, which are in four registers, covering 1454–56, 1460–65, 1465–72 and 1472–81, though the last are incomplete.⁵⁵ In analysing the registers, which give annual attendances for the papegay shoot, and for both annual meals as well as entrance and death fees, 755 guild-brothers can be identified between 1454 and 1481, as shown in table 4. In both guilds, the members were required to be poorters⁵⁶, so had to be of some status, but in comparing the names of the guild-brothers to numerous other sources in the town and state archives, the guild-brothers can be seen to have included noblemen, municipal officers, tax collectors, all levels of professions of Bruges, and members of other social and devotional groups.

Noblemen including the dukes of Burgundy took part in shooting competitions with the Bruges guild. Such interactions are not unique to Bruges; all four Valois dukes of Burgundy were in the Ghent guild of Saint George.⁵⁷ It is not surprising, therefore, to find noblemen in the two Bruges guilds. The Saint George list gives the names of 28 nobles before the 902 guild-brothers, and an additional 20 noblemen appear in the membership list itself. Of these forty-eight noblemen, two are unidentifiable, as they are listed only by their titles, ‘my lord the captain’ and ‘my lord the president.’ The first is named as ‘my lord the captain’ this is likely to mean the Captain of Bruges. The Second is ‘my lord the president.’ and is very likely to refer to the president of the Council. Could either name be dated, the individual who held office could be found and so the name of the member known, but as this section is written in a different hand, and cannot be dated, the specific captain and president mentioned here cannot be securely identified. Five of the forty-eight noblemen can be securely identified as members of both the archers as well as the crossbowmen. Additionally six noble men were archers, but not crossbowmen. These 54 noblemen were a diverse mix of great lords and newly ennobled patricians, all highlighting the most ‘elite’ of the guild brothers.

First on the Saint George list is Philip the Good himself. His entrance is not dated, but as his name is the first on a new list, part of a new book begun in 1438, it is safe to assume that he joined shortly after the 1436-8 rebellion, perhaps to help rebuild social bonds with the town through the guild. Philip’s membership in the guild highlights how prestigious the crossbowmen had become, and he visited them again in 1454 to attend a feast.

Philip’s eldest illegitimate son, Anthony the Great Bastard of Burgundy entered the crossbow guild at the same time as his father. He was also active with the archers of Saint Sebastian, becoming their ‘king’ in 1463, and like his father he was active with the Ghent crossbowmen, and led the Lille crossbowmen to the great Tournai competition of 1455.⁵⁸ Two additional knights of the Golden Fleece were in the Saint George guild, Lodewijk van Gruuthuse and Engelbert van Nassau. Other ducal courtiers joined the crossbow guild, including Joos de Baenst, a varlet of Charles the Bold from 1475 and Philip van Maldeghem, an advisor to Mary of Burgundy and an ambassador. More noblemen joined the crossbow guild than the archers, but the Saint Sebastian guild also included influential figures, including a member of the van Praat family, a lord of Merwede in Holland.

Among the 54 noblemen in the guilds, by far the most numerous are the prestigious families of Bruges best described as ‘patricians’. ‘Patrician’ is an imperfect term of these men, but used here to refer to families that rose from the merchant classes to be perceived as noblemen, the line between ‘nobles’ and non-nobles continues to provoke debate,⁵⁹ but the powerful Bruges families who were either ennobled or lived in a noble way, should be analysed separately to understand the status of the shooting guilds. Foremost among these families were the Adornes, Genoese merchants who had arrived in Flanders in the fourteenth century, and who quickly became very wealthy members of Bruges society.⁶⁰ Both Pieter (d. 1464) and Jacob (d. 1465), the brothers who founded the Jeruzalemkapel, were members of the Saint Sebastian guild.⁶¹ Four other Adornes were in the archery guild, and two, Pieter and his son Anselmus, were in both the archers and the crossbowmen. Anselmus is worthy of particular note; he was a jousting with the White Bear, holder of multiple municipal offices, a pilgrim to the Holy Land, a courtier of Philip the Good and Charles the Bold and ambassador to Scotland. When he was in Bruges he was also active with the guilds, attending at least 20 archery papegay shoots and 7 guild meals.

Other patrician families are numerous in both the archery and crossbow guilds, including the Metteneye family. Like the Adornes a powerful family with international connections,⁶² included six men who were in the Saint Sebastian guild, one, Joris, who was in both guilds and two others, Wouter and Kristoffel, who were crossbowmen. Other families active with the guilds include the Van Themseke family, of whom 5 were members of the Saint George guild, and Van Clarout and de Baenst families, with 3 members each in the crossbowmen.⁶³ The 54 noble guild-brothers included all ranks of the nobility, though how active some of these men were is not clear, that they all could interact with the guild in some way, and thought it worth joining the shooting guilds, is significant, showing the desirability of the guilds, perhaps their 'elite' status.

Fifteenth-century Bruges was governed by two benches of twelve men: the schepenen, (aldermen) and the raad, (councillors), each with their own burgomasters. Individuals could not hold office for two consecutive years, but many held office multiple times throughout their lives, and certain families provided significant numbers of aldermen and councillors, though as Andrew Brown has noted the government was 'neither a monolithic nor an unchanging body.' In the fifteenth century powerful merchants and entrepreneurs (including the Metteneye and Themseke families) had a good degree of control over civic government.⁶⁴

Arguably the most prestigious civic officers were the burgomasters, who oversaw all matters of governance. Guild-brothers of both the archers and the crossbowmen could rise to this office, and equally men powerful enough to hold this office felt it to be worth their while to join both the archery and crossbow guilds. In the fifteenth century 16 crossbowmen and 11 archers, almost 2% of each guild were burgomasters, showing both had small but significant links to these most powerful of civic officials. Among the aldermen there were 47 crossbowmen and 30 archers. Of the 47 crossbowmen, 15 held office four times or more, 19 once, 11 twice and 3 were aldermen 3 times. The 30 archers held office less frequently, with 14 of them holding office only once, 6 twice, and 5 of them three times and only 4 more often than this. In all 5.3% of the identifiable crossbowmen and 4% of archers, were aldermen. The guilds also included councillors, from the crossbowmen there came 54 councillors, with 40 from the archers. Of the 54 crossbowmen 30 held the position only once, while 10 did so more than three times. Among the 40 archers 22 guild-brothers held this post only once, and only 4 did so more than three times; 6.1% of crossbowmen and 5.3% of archers, were councillors at least once in the fifteenth century.

Significant numbers from both guilds held positions within the civic government of fifteenth-century Bruges. The presence of office-holders here, as guild-brothers, may even imply that membership in the guild helped individuals to rise in status, to gain more ‘moral credit’ and so become office holders, as membership in certain Parisian confraternities did.⁶⁵ Indeed several of the guild-brothers held office together, perhaps helping their guild-brothers into office. In 1490 and again in 1492 two crossbowmen, Matheus de Broucker and Jacob Gheerolf, both crossbowmen since the 1470s, served together as aldermen. In 1494 Jacob served his third term, and was joined by another crossbowman, Thomas Houtmaerc. In 1483 three archers, two of whom joined the confraternity in 1467 and a third who joined in 1468, served as aldermen together: Daneel Daneels, Jan van Nieuwenhove and Oste vanden Rade. In 1445 no fewer than four crossbowmen sat together as councillors, all four had done so at least twice before, two of them in 1440 and the other two in 1439. The four were Jan Parlant, Jacop Bieze, Symoen van Aerrike and Jacop Braederyc. Such important links demonstrate powerful networks of shooters at work, and may even imply that joining a shooting guild aided access to power.

Archers and crossbowmen were active in all levels of municipal government. 16 crossbowmen and 13 archers served in the treasury, either as treasurers or as part of the committees of the

1470s and 80s who administered and collected several large taxes, meaning that 1.8% of all crossbowmen and 1.7% of the archers served in the treasury. Further, from the crossbowmen, there were 8 sergeants, 2 members of the garrison, 2 messengers and 10 others who received pensions or payments, ranging from £10 to £300 gr. annually. From the archers there was only one sergeant, but 6 members of the garrison, 1 messenger and 9 others who received pensions, although most of these were far lower than those given to crossbowmen, between £12 and £100 annually. Admittedly some figures here are very small, but it is significant that every municipal office was filled by at least one guild-brother at least once, no office was beyond the guild and no municipal officer was too grand to interact with the guilds.

Guild-brothers can also be traced among the financially powerful of fifteenth-century Bruges, collecting taxes at every level of Bruges' complex fiscal system. Town accounts detail direct taxes as well as larger indirect ones, the largest being on drinks.⁶⁶ Among those who collected the largest taxes, the wine tax, were 21 crossbowmen and 14 archers, respectively 2.3% and 1.9% of the guilds. The Metteneye family are particularly prominent here, especially crossbowman Wouter Metteneye who was one of four men who collected the wine tax from 1416-30. Also among the wine tax-collectors was the archer and crossbowman Joris Metteneye, the crossbowman Kristoffel Metteneye and the archers Jacob and Pieter Metteneye. The guild included all levels of powerful figures, and many different interconnected networks were present within the guilds.

Other guild-brothers collected the other drink taxes, on the 'Brugsche' and 'Delfsche' beers and mead. In all, 27 crossbowmen, or just over 3% of the identified members collected one of the beer or mead taxes at least once, many of them for decades at a time. For the archers the total is just 10, or 1.3% of the guild. Seven of these men had also collected the wine taxes, though not in the same years, perhaps investing the profits from one tax collection into the next project. Archers and crossbowmen also collected many of Bruges numerous smaller civic charges farmed out to individuals, rights and charges to be collected similar to tax-farms, many of these are for rights or duties and fishing (visscherie). Such taxes could be as little as 40 shillings and were rarely more than £20, although some individuals collected multiple taxes. Town accounts note 35 archers and 41 crossbowmen collecting at least one of these taxes at least once; this is 4.6% of each guild. Again networks and overlapping memberships are presented, the archers Jan van Nieuwenhove and Gillis Clais were collecting visscherie taxes together in 1445-6, perhaps helping their guild-brothers into the tax system.

Several guild-brothers collected multiple taxes, such as Jacob Breydel who in different years collected wine and beer taxes, as well as smaller charges, but guilds also included those who paid very small sums in direct taxation. In 1441-2 a special aid was imposed upon Bruges to pay ducal taxes. Though payments were required from six administrative areas of Bruges, the zestendelen, only one set have survived: those of Saint Jan's. The surviving records name 864 individuals, occasionally families, who contributed to the aides.⁶⁷ Only 15 archers appear on this list, not too surprising a statistic given that the tax predates the Saint Sebastian records by 13 years, and only the oldest archers would have been householders. The smaller number of crossbowmen here is harder to explain; only 6 feature here, perhaps reflecting that not many lived in this area of Bruges.

Further information can be gleaned from a closer analysis of these small figures. Most of the 864 individuals named in Sint Jan's records paid relatively large sums, over £5 each year, so it is significant that 3 crossbowmen paid over £10 in both years. In contrast one archer, Jan van den Casteel, paid only once for one half year, the small sum of 4 s 4 d. One register, with its limited data, cannot be assumed to be representative of the other zestendelen, nor can the number of members living in this administrative area of Bruges be taken to be one sixth of the whole. Of the small but significant numbers of guild-brothers who were adults in 1442, some were householders, some paying large amounts of money to the town. Conversely, at least one paid a very small amount, and many others were likely to be resident in this area, many may not have been wealthy enough to contribute, showing the diversity of the guilds.

In all 55 archers, 7.3% of the guild, and 89 crossbowmen, just over 10% collected some type of tax at least once. As with figures of municipal officials, some figures are very small, but it is important to note that at least one guild-brother collected or paid every form of taxation at least once. Although difficult to set in context, the figures here demonstrate the wealth of some guild-brothers, their status and their influence, in turn showing the desirability of guild membership, and again no civic financial office was beyond the guild.

Studying the professions of guild-brothers is more challenging, as not all craft guilds have left records, and profession could not be traced for all guild-brothers. Yet in drawing together all available information in the guild registers, and other sources in the civic and state archives, the professions of 324 crossbowmen and 413 archers can be ascertained. It is worth emphasising that nothing comparable has been attempted for any other shooting guild, or any other festive or cultural groups in Flanders. Numbers for guild-brothers can be compared to a cross-section of Bruges society as a whole, based on the figures for the 1436 militia sent to Calais, as analysed in Dumolyn, De Brugse Opstand,⁶⁸ as shown in table 1. The craft guilds are in the order they marched to Calais, also the order for the annual procession, given are percentages for the militia and the percentages of each guild in a particular profession.

Not all guild-brothers' professions fit into these 54 guilds, others are in table 2. Many such professions are harder to quantify, as it is not clear what percentage of men in Bruges were clerks, but together the tables provide a clear picture of guilds' compositions relative to Bruges as a whole.

As the numbers of shooters' professions are incomplete, lower percentages might be expected across table 1, but a rather different pattern emerges. Firstly, perhaps unsurprisingly, military crafts are over-represented in the guilds compared to their percentages in a cross-section of Bruges. Bowyers made up only 0.89% of the militia, but 1.45% of the archers, while the armourers made up 0.67% of the militia and 0.79% of the archers. This figure would grow if the three lorniers (makers of spurs, harnesses and other horse equipment) were added. That shooting guilds should contain more military profession, especially bowyers, than the town as a whole is to be expected, as men who made bows and crossbows were more likely to be skilled in their use.

For other crafts, percentages in the shooting guilds are in line with percentages from the 1436 militia. For example, the turners (draaiers) made up 0.89% of the militia, 0.4% of the archers and 0.9% of the crossbowman, the millers made up 0.89% of the militia, 0.56% of the archers and 0.56% of the crossbowmen, and finally girdlers, or belt makers, made up 0.67% of the militia and 0.4% of the archers and 0.45% of the crossbowmen. Several mid-ranking professions were as well represented in the archery and crossbow guilds as they had been in the 1436 militia, showing that for some crafts, the shooting guilds were a fair cross-section of Bruges society.

Certain luxury craftsmen were over-represented in the guilds compared to the numbers in the militia. The number of painters in both guilds is particular striking, including painters, image makers and a glazier. The painters' guild made up only 0.89% of the militia, not all such men were prestigious artists, but they were in demand craftsmen, especially in Bruges.⁶⁹

Artists made up a very significant 2.25% of the archers and 2.81% of the crossbowmen. Like the bowyers these men could have been serving their guilds, both sets of account books record payments for painting buildings and shields. Such figures could be seen as showing 'elite' status, but other high status crafts were greatly under-represented, butchers, powerful, exclusive though often feared craftsmen, as their 'tools' were so similar to weapons, made up 2.89% of the militia, but only 0.13% of the archers and 0.34% of the crossbowmen. Further the three most powerful guilds, the weavers, fullers and shearers, each making up 3.11% of the 1436 militia were all under-represented in both guilds.

In addition two further high status occupations, brokers and shippers, were under-represented in the guilds. The brokers (make-laars) made up 7.11% of the militia; such wealthy and influential men were the kind that might have been expected to join shooting guilds, but brokers made up only 0.53% of the archers and 1.13% of the crossbowmen. Shippers would have been wealthy, with connections far beyond Bruges. Shippers made up 3.33% of the militia, but just 1.85% of the archers and 0.34% of the crossbowmen. It could be that men whose profession required them to be absent from Bruges for significant periods of time chose not to join the shooting guilds, as archery required a great deal of practise, but all of these figures show that describing the guilds as 'elite' or indeed as 'bourgeois' is simplistic and misleading.

It is also clear that differences existed between the archers and the crossbowmen in professional make up. Tilers, tegeldekkers, made up 0.89% of the militia, and were over represented in the archers, of whom 1.59% were tilers, and slightly under-represent in the crossbowmen, with 0.56% of their members tilers. The number of glovers in the archers, at 0.93% was in line with the number in the militia, at 0.89%, yet no crossbowmen at all are recorded as practising this craft. Conversely thatchers, strodekkers, who made up 0.22% of the militia, are overrepresented in the crossbowmen, with 0.45% of identifiable crossbowmen being thatchers, with no archers linked to this profession. Such figures do not prove or disprove ‘elite’ status, rather they show that membership of shooting guilds was another part of an individual’s identity, connected to membership in other guilds and in other networks, as Rosser has shown was significant among English confraternities.⁷⁰

Attention must also be paid to guild-brothers in table 2. Several of these are craft guilds of some importance, including the chandler’s guild, a but prominent small guild, sending just five in the militia of 1436,⁷¹ and 3 archers and 2 crossbowmen, were candle-makers. Members of both guilds were active within the various markets of Bruges, such men may also have been linked to craft guilds but would have been wealthy individuals and men of some power and social influence. Officials from the grain, cloth, linen and bird markets make up 1.64% of the archers and an impressive 2.71% of the crossbowmen. The other wardens, of the soap wax and halls, and the wardens of the English wool staple, made up 0.93% of the archers and 1.35% of the crossbowmen. Such figures imply that wealthier, powerful men, were more likely to be crossbowmen, and indeed there is some evidence that lower status individual had greater access to the archery guild than to the crossbow guild, with no labourers recorded in the crossbow guild but 6, in the Saint Sebastian guild, making up 0.79% of the archers.

The largest figures from the archers in table 2 are those associated with beer, 19 brewers 2.51% of the guild, 9 beer carriers, 1.19%, and 2 inn-keepers. It is tempting simply to link this to commensality, and the significant quantity of beer consumed at guild feasts, or to see a hierarchy between the shooters, with crossbowmen involved in wine and archers involved in the beer trade. Such explanations are plausible, and it seems likely that these men were providing beer to their guild-brothers, but there must also be networks present here. Men involved in the same profession were more likely to join the same festive or devotional group as their peers, and the brewers among the archery guild may have had strong traditional links that the records, beginning as they do in the middle of the fifteenth century, do not show.

Yet other figures drawn from table 2 confirm that the guilds are a complex cross section of civic society. Clerks, well-educated and once again trusted figures made up 0.40% of the crossbowmen but just 0.11% of the archers. Those involved in the 'ramen' hanging cloth on tents for inspection and sale, would also have been influential men, yet just 1 crossbowman, compared with 4 archers, was involved with cloth tenting. Several of the other professions in table 2 are harder to quantify, with ferry-men, comb-makers, a gardener, a cheesemonger and a messenger all active with one or other of the shooting guilds. Such figures are hard to put into context, but provide further evidence of the variety of crafts and profession within the Bruges guilds.

Again another level of detail and networks exists within the shooting-guilds. It is possible that the higher number of some crafts, and lower number of others, are explained by craftsmen helping their fellows to join the shooting guilds, but this is speculation. What is clear, are patterns of craft guild office holding, comparable to those observed for municipal office-holders. Each of Bruges' 54 craft guilds were administered annually by one or two dekens and four to six vinders, elected each year by the guild. Dekens, or deans, administered the guild while the vinders, or finders, made sure all members followed correct working practices, being responsible for 'finding a judgment' in any disputes or questions. All were expected to be reliable men and though one could not hold the same office in consecutive year, many men held office multiple times during their working lives. In 1477 two crossbowmen, Joos

Aernouts and Heindric Waghe, were both vinders of the straw-thatchers. In 1441, another 2 crossbowmen, Jacop Inghel and Joris vanden Velde were officials for the second hand clothes sellers. This was also common among the archers; in 1477 of the six vinders controlling the sale of English wool two, Adriaen Dunc and Lodewijk van Hille, were archers. Performing the same function in a craft guild in the same year, and being members of the same shooting guilds shows that interests could overlap, shooters socialised and worked with their guild-brothers, social units built in the shooting guilds helped individuals to hold higher position together in craft guilds. Such analysis from Bruges again fits with English evidence presented by Rosser that integration into London confraternities helped integration into the city, and opened the door to a range of social and political ties, indeed useful friendships, with guilds helping social mobility.⁷²

In trying to understand the shooting guilds, those members who were active in other social or devotional groups, or who had additional kin bonds within guilds, must also be considered. The shooting guilds were devotional groups, with chapels, priests and patron saints, they were festive groups, with spectacular competitions and they could be considered social networks, building such bonds through commensality, yet members sought further opportunities beyond the guilds. The most famous of these other groups are the jousters of the White Bear, urban jousters staging events attended by leading townsmen, lords and the dukes of Burgundy.⁷³ It is tempting to consider shooting guilds and jousters as separate discrete groups, but membership could and did overlap; 32 crossbowmen, 3.6% of guild-brothers, and 20 archers, 3.2%, jousted at least once, not counting noble shooters, such as Anthony the Great Bastard and Lodewijk van Gruuthuse. Though relatively small in number, the shooters who were also jousters show again the diversity of identities within Bruges, and that jousters should not be considered as more ‘elite’ than shooters.

Chambers of rhetoric might be expected to have more in common with the shooting guilds. Unfortunately little information on the membership of the Bruges chambers of rhetoric, the Holy Ghost and The Three Samaritans has survived. One membership list from 1442⁷⁴ and another fragment from 1494⁷⁵ are all that have survived for the Holy Ghost. For the Three Samaritans only part of a list from 1490 is extant, although some members can be reconstructed from sixteenth-century documents.⁷⁶ Given the dates of these sources, few names from the shooters should be expected, and just 5 crossbowmen, and 1 archer, were in the Holy Ghost, more were probably taking part, again showing that no separation existed between shooters and chambers of rhetoric.

The range of devotional options open to the townsmen of late medieval Bruges should not be seen as implying in some way that the shooters were failing in their devotional responsibilities, rather, as Rosser has emphasised for English guilds, membership within multiple Bruges guild highlights individuals negotiating their way into society, using different groups to interact in different ways. Trio has further emphasised that most late medieval citizens were in a confraternity, several were members of multiple groups to improve their chances of salvation, and to take part in different communities,⁷⁷ and several archers and crossbowmen sought additional devotion beyond that provided by the shooting guilds in one of the numerous other confraternities in fifteenth-century Bruges.

One of the wealthiest such confraternities was the Drogenboom, or Dry Tree, named for the Immaculate Conception, and dating from at least 1396.⁷⁸ The Dry Tree was exclusive, its members including Italian bankers, the dukes of Burgundy and several courtiers,⁷⁹ as well as 19 (2% of the guild) crossbowmen and 10 archers (1.3%). The Dry Tree was a large, prestigious confraternity, but passive, as no annual obligations were required of members. In contrast the Hulsterloo and Rosebeke confraternities were more active, involving annual pilgrimages. The former was associated with the skinners, and drew many members from outside Bruges,⁸⁰ as well as 17 crossbowmen (1.9%) and 14 archers (1.8%). The latter was a wealthy confraternity, with associations to the court,⁸¹ but its members also included 18 crossbowmen (2%) and 10 archers (1.3%). In contrast to such prestigious confraternities, the Our Lady of the Snow guild was Bruges's largest confraternity, and most inclusive, with annual fees of just 2 d. Members included the dukes of Burgundy, bishops of Tournai, but also many poor widows of Bruges.⁸² 47 crossbowmen, 5% of the guild, and 44 archers, almost 6% of the guild were enrolled in the Our Lady of the Snow confraternity.

Guild-brothers of both shooting guilds of Bruges joined a range of other social and devotional groups in Bruges, showing no segregation existed between the shooters and the jousters, chambers of rhetoric and devotional confraternities. Both shooting guilds represented a wide cross-section of the social classes of Bruges. A further element of guild society must be considered along with these social and cultural interactions, social and kin bonds within the shooting guilds, yet such bonds, especially kin or marriage connections, are difficult to trace for all but the most prestigious and best documented families. Jan and Jacob Breydel were both in the archery and crossbow guilds, Jan's son Tobyas was also in the archery guild. In addition, Jan married the daughter of fellow crossbowman Jacob Baerd.

The Metteneyes and Adorns were, as we have seen, particularly well represented in the guilds, and had other social and kin bonds with guild-brothers. Anselmus Adornes chose prestigious crossbowmen Lodewijk van Gruuthuse and Jan de Baenst, as godfathers to some of his sixteen children.⁸³ Jacob Metteneye married the daughter of a fellow archer, Jacop Bierse. In addition, the records of the archers of Saint Sebastian include women and children in the guild each year, the archers paid 6 d a year for membership, the women and children just 2 d. In 1455 Jan vande Velde, a grocer (kruidenier) paid 2 d each for his wife and four children, there were an additional 24 women in the guild that year. As the women and children are rarely named (beyond their identification as 'wife of'), their part in guild networks is difficult to discern. Yet the presence of women and children, prepared to pay to be part of a shooting guild, is in itself significant for the power and diversity of networks and bonds within the guilds.

Kin relations between adult males are often difficult to prove. It is likely that Jacob Donckere 'the old' who was dean of the crossbowmen in 1444 was the father of the Jacob Donckere 'the young' who joined the guild in 1457. Equally Jan Neerync 'the old' who joined the archery guild in 1452 is likely to be the father, or at least relative, of Jan Neerync ‘the young’ who joined the guild in 1468 and became king in 1472, but such relations are impossible to prove for members below the patrician families.

CONCLUSION

The archery and crossbow guilds of Bruges are first documented in the early fourteenth century, though they may have existed for decades as informal groups. The guild-brothers were potential civic defenders, as well as soldiers in princely armies, but were far more than militias. The guilds were social and devotional groups, dedicated to patron saints, maintaining altars, with rules for masses and for commensality that should have strengthened interpersonal connections within the guild. When the guilds left Bruges to take part in spectacular competitions, they strengthened regional connections, even networks. Such networks brought in certain nobles but more than this they represented civic honour, even civic ideology, and could show the prestige and power of Bruges.

The shooting guilds were important groups within Bruges; they were also very diverse and internally strong communities. ‘Elites’ including Philip the Good, noble and patrician families and civic office holders were indeed present in the guilds, but so too were members of a broad range of the professions of Bruges, some were under-represented some over-represented; but no profession was excluded from the guilds. The popularity of some professions over others may be explained by networks within in guilds, and it seems likely that guild-brothers in the same professions helped each other to hold office in their craft guild. Guild-brothers were also members of other groups, highlighting that jousters, chambers of rhetoric and shooters were not discreet groups, but had overlapping membership as townsmen looked for different identities, different expression of their cultural and devotional ambitions and different ways to build bonds and networks. The archery and crossbow guilds of Bruges were powerful and extremely complex groups. They could represent their towns in great competitions as they were composed of a broad mix of their towns, they were too diverse and too powerful to be labelled simply as ‘elite’ or as ‘bourgeois’; in war, in cultural events, in devotion and in their composition, the guilds represented Bruges.

APPENDIX.

Those professions marked with an asterisk (*) are those referred to in the glossary.

A SHORT GLOSSARY OF PROFESSIONS

In the following, all professions are translated into modern English, and just one profession is given for each individual. The reality for some profession and guilds is rather more complicated, as some of the 54 craft guilds included connected professions, and some individuals could move between closely linked guilds over the course of their lives.

Furriers. The three furrier guilds, lamworkers, grauworkers and wiltworkers, worked different kinds of furs. Each had their own regulation, but were closely linked in organisation and membership; there was a basic hierarchy to the guilds, with grauworkers the lowest, skinning low status animals, even rats, lamworkers mainly skinning sheep and the wiltworkers skinning higher status animals, like ermine. For example crossbowman Jan Payne entered the lower status grauworkers in 1420, at which point he had no children, but later served as an inspector (vinder) for the wiltworkers, as did fellow crossbowman Jacop de Groote, becoming a grauworker in 1430 and acting as ‘vinder’ of the wiltworkers in 1435 and as dean in 1441. In table 1, no wiltworkers are recorded as every archer or crossbowman who appears as a wiltworker appeared as a grauworker or lambworker first, though changing guilds was not uncommon.⁸⁴

Painters and saddlers. This guild, which included large numbers of archers and crossbowmen, included many connected professions, in particular image-maker (beeldenmakers) and glaziers.

Bowyers. The bowyers' guild included any involved in the production of bows and arrows, in particular fletchers (arrow-makers) and bowstring makers.

Smiths and Silversmiths. Both included other smiths, locksmiths were also present among the smiths guild and goldsmiths were part of the silversmiths' guild.

Girdlers. Riemmakers literally 'belt makers' but girdlers is a more general term, covering those who made the metal fastenings as well as the leather or even cloth belts.

Cobblers. The 'Cordewaniers' or 'schoenmakers' of Bruges were shoe-makers, or cobblers. They were closely linked to leather trades, but the Flemish word 'cordewanier' should not be confused with the English word 'Cordwainers' though they share an etymological link from 'Corio' (Leather). The English term can mean shoe-maker, but is used more broadly for other leather workers including glovers and girdlers. 'witledertouwers' literally white-leather workers could be translated as cordwainers, but since the English term is ambiguous it has not been used here. Also included among the cobblers are three patternmakers, 2 from the crossbowmen and one archer, these men made shoes with wooden soles, in London the patternmakers were among the livery companies, emerging as an independent craft in the fifteenth century.⁸⁵ The wooden shoes they made are similar to those visible in Van Eyk's famous Arnolfini wedding portrait.

Realities of Guild Life in an Export-Oriented Environment,' in: Journal of Medieval History, 30 (2004), p. 187-212.

85 C. M. BARRON, London in the Later Middle Ages, Government and People 1200-1500, Oxford, 2007, p. 68-69.

Curriers. Like the furriers, the various leather guilds were connected and it is difficult to sum up the precision of the Flemish terms in English. The guilds of ‘witledertouwers’, ‘zwartledeertouwers’ and ‘dobberers’ have all been translated as ‘curriers’ or leather-workers, rather than the literal white, black and wet leather workers. In London, as in other English towns, the curriers were a sizable guild drawing in craftsmen involved in many different leather specialisms.⁸⁶ As with the furriers, moving between leather guilds was not uncommon, but again individuals have been analysed for the guild in which they are first registered.

Weavers. The men listed here as weavers include not just the wool-weavers but also the fleece weavers (tijkwevers), though linen weavers formed a separate guild.

Loriners. Loriners were makers of harnesses, spurs and other horse equipment. The Flemish terms ‘ghoreelmaker’ and ‘spor-maker’ both translate as Loriner; these small professions existed separately to the saddlers or armourers guilds.

Inn-keepers. Two archers are recorded as being ‘cabaretiers’, this profession has been translated as inn-keeper, and these men would have run local taverns, rather than being the great hoteliers associated with makelaars and international trade.

SAMENVATTING

Gilden van handboog- en kruisboogschutters verschenen in Europa in de vroege 14^{de} eeuw. Ze waren al vaak het voorwerp van historisch onderzoek uit verschillende oogpunten, maar de gildebroeders zelf en hun positie in de stedelijke samenleving zijn nog te weinig bestudeerd. Hieraan komt het artikel van Laura Crombie tegemoet door dergelijk onderzoek te voeren naar de Brugse schuttersgilden in de 15^{de} eeuw, als onderdeel van een bredere studie waarmee de auteur bezig is. Zij schetst eerst kort het ontstaan van de gilden, hun verenigingsleven en hun godsdienstige activiteiten en gaat in op de functie van de schutterscompetities waaraan de Brugse Sint-Jorisgilde en Sint-Sebastiaansgilde deelnamen in Vlaanderen en er buiten. Hierin toonden ze niet alleen hun schutterskunde maar smeeden ze tevens netwerken en droegen de eer van hun stad uit. Dan volgt de analyse van de politieke, economische en sociale status van de individuele gildebroeders, voornamelijk gebaseerd op een ledenlijst van de Sint-Jorisgilde en haar 15^{de}-eeuwse rekeningen en op de gelijkaardige rekeningen van de Sint-Sebastiaansgilde. Hieruit blijkt dat onder de gildebroeders zowel edelen te vinden waren als leden van andere vooraanstaande stedelijke families, ook leden van de stadsmagistraat, belastingontvangers en belastingbetalers, ambachtslieden van alle slag en van verschillende niveaus en leden van andere sociale en godsdienstige groepen zoals de ridders van de Witte Beer, de rederijkerskamers, en de broederschappen van de Drogenboom, Hulsterlo, Rozebeke en Onze-Lieve-Vrouw ter Sneeuw. Beide schuttersgilden vertegenwoordigden dus een brede doorsnede van de sociale groepen in Brugge. Ook familierelaties speelden een rol in de lidmaatschappen. Het besluit is dat de Brugse schuttersgilden belangrijke en complexe groepen waren in de stad. Zij vertegenwoordigden een brede scala van de stadsbevolking en kunnen niet simpelweg als elitair worden afgedaan. Na deze analyse volgen een glossarium van beroepsnamen en vier tabellen, met achtereenvolgens de 54 ambachtsgilden van de stadsmilitie van 1436, de andere beroepen, de leden van de kruisbooggilde en die van de handbooggilde.
